Covid-19 Period Academic Planning and Timetable

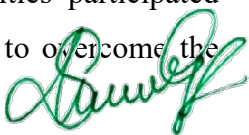

Learning and education are two of the biggest world issues of the current pandemic. Unfortunately, it is seen in this work that, due to the length of the incubation period of Covid-19, full opening of schools in the fall of 2020 seems to be impractical unless the spread of the virus is completely under control in the surrounding region.

The outbreak of COVID-19 has forced changes due to an environment of uncertainty, chaos, and fear as the infectious virus spread throughout the world. The COVID-19 virus has had an unprecedented impact. Higher education institutions have two basic choices in preparing for, managing and mitigating crises. They can try to anticipate and avert them, and/or become resilient. It is desirable, of course, to anticipate and avert crises whenever possible, but anticipation can be effective only in situations where (1) the probability of the worst risks to be faced are known, and (2) knowledge can be used to avoid or mitigate negative outcomes.

The forced change to remote learning was stressful as neither faculty nor students were prepared for the rapid change to online teaching since many academic institutions lacked the faculty with experience in online teaching. The transition to remote online delivery required radical changes in attitude, values, and beliefs for many faculty, students and administrators. It also required process and procedure enhancements, new strategies, and even new ways of doing business for most institutions.

To overcome all the difficulties of the Covid-19 impact, following the SOP of the Government of State and Central and affiliated University our institution has prepared a plan which helps both students and faculty to move in academic work without facing any hurdles.

The student teachers were trained to use online platforms for classroom teaching and made flexible timetables for these classes. Class attendance was taken through google forms, and regular classes were taken through ZOOM, Google Meet, and Teachmint platforms. For assigning the works we have used Google Classroom as a LMS, conducted online tests using testmoz, google forms and quizzes. Even our institution has taken initiation that conducted online co-curricular activities, which means not only curricular exposure but also co-curricular activities they can involve more effectively. Our student teachers and faculties participated actively and faced minimum obstacles and their planning in a team helps us to overcome the Pandemic situation
